Get a handle on your headaches.

Almost everyone gets headaches from time to time. They are usually nothing to worry about. Learning to avoid things that trigger headaches and spot and treat symptoms early are key. But you should also know when to seek help.

Know the different types. This breakdown of common headaches from the Mayo Clinic goes over tension, migraine cluster and other headaches. It can help you tell the difference based on how they feel.

Learn your triggers. Some headaches can be caused by foods. Others by medication and lifestyle factors.

Keep a headache diary. For each headache, take note of the day, time it started, how intense it was, symptoms you felt before and triggers you know of. Also, write the medication you took, the relief you felt and when it stopped.

Talk to your healthcare provider. This information is not intended to be a substitute for professional medical advice, diagnosis or treatment. See a healthcare provider for help with your headaches and questions you have.
